Patients will not carry out a physician's advice unless they are extremely ill. That is a human trait. We want to be told, but we dislike to do what we are told. The will is sluggish. There is no royal road to fame, neither is there to health and beauty unless one happens to be one of those rare people with a wonderful constitution and abundant good looks, but even in such a case middle life usually brings with it an undue increase in weight, and, unless the soul is a fine one, the face takes on an unpleasant expression that betrays the inner man.

I that great army of busy workers, whether in factory, office, church or club, who scarcely take time to eat—and even forget to eat—these are they who suffer the torments so graphically described by the martyr to dyspepsia, Carlyle.

We must never forget that no business is o important as the preservation of health and everything else must conform to that. If your duties interfere with the appointed meal hours, then appoint hours of your own—only be careful to preserve a stated regularity. Set that time aside for eating and allow nothing to interfere with it. Eat only is a fine one, the face takes on an unpleasant expression that betrays the inner man.

It is no more difficult to pursue the laws of health than to abuse them.
Some err from ignorance, others from inertia, and others again lack the inertia, and others again l inertia, and others again lack the will power to alter their mode of living. Habit is a heavy tax master—it is as easy to cultivate good habits as it is to acquire bad ones.

All good things must come from within. That is one of nature's inex—shows no favoritism to this, that, or the orable laws, but we ignore it a dozen times a day, and then wonder that we are not "gifted" with a heaviful come. next morning.

None of these can be permanently attained without good health; that is the foundation, they are the super-structure. Good health depends primarily upon the state of the blood, and as the blood is derived from the food in the process of digestion you see what tremendous importance this assumes.

see what tremendous importance this function immediately assumes.

It is safe to say that indignation is almost always due to indiscretions in diet—diet includes not only what we eat, but how we eat it. A crust of bread and a glass of water are more conducive to good health and long life, if taken properly and with good cheer, than the most abundant meal eaten in haste or amid uncongenial surroundings.

Then there are certain practices of eating that soon become habits, and as man is a creature of habit it is well to cultivate only such as will insure the thorough digestion of the food we consume. Regularity of hours is one. Among those who lead leisurely lives, who are more or responsibilities, this is comperatively easy, but
